Title : Dramatic Reality by Dr Abdus Sattar Abbasi

Source : The Nation

Dated : April 8, 2022

WebLinks: <https://nation.com.pk/2022/04/08/dramatic-reality/>

Conflict is the foundation of dramatic reality. Players in media and politics intentionally or unintentionally join hands to create dramatic realities to develop and drive narratives. Both usually start their discourses with disagreements, frictions and antagonism to quickly grasp the attention of the masses.

Blake Ashforth from University of Arizona and his colleague suggest, “Life consists of diverse actions while drama is a structured action. Dramatic reality refers to the organisation of what may be otherwise factually accurate information about people and events in ways that stress certain facts and underplay others. Using dramatic narratives, media and politicians are able to selectively distil a complex jumble of otherwise ambiguous and contradictory circumstances, events, pronouncements, and impressions into a simplified and relatively coherent portrayal. Elements of drama convey information in a manner that stimulates audience interest, identification, and engagement. Dramatic narratives increase the apparent importance of a fact, therefore, allows both the politicians and the media to report news and engage their audiences morally and emotionally.”

According to Violina Rindova from University of Maryland and his colleagues, “Dramatic narratives usually begin with a disturbance to a seemingly calm or balanced situation. The disturbance creates conflict as a set of circumstances that present people with change and adversity.”

In politics or generally in the society changes and uncertainties arise from several endogenous &/or exogenous shocks e.g. changing loyalties, emerging or diminishing alliances, economic conditions, technological changes, cultural evolution, capacity development etc. All such changes enable the media and the politicians to portray dramatic dissonance, because these changes disrupt the status quo and present relevant stakeholders with new challenges and opportunities. The greater the impact of the change on various stakeholders, the greater the extent to which these changes could be adapted as a source for dramatic reality.

It usually surprised me to notices news of every murder, rape, theft, and robbery right early in the morning on TV screens. We have been witnessing reports of decline in customer turnover on almost every Eid. We are now attuned to the news of economic susceptibility and collapse of democratic process in the Country.

Blaming outgoing or ousted regimes has become a fashion and probably the most palatable narrative for masses. This all emerges from the very first pillar of dramatic reality the conflict, which all these players utilise knowingly or unknowingly to attain attention of masses but they fail to comprehend the damaging aspect of creating this purposeful strife, friction and thrill. Common citizens pay the price for these conflicting and thrilling narratives through stress, depression, confusion and hostility.

The beauty of human interactions lies in honourable exchanges, calm discourses, and logical narratives. However our current social environment is packed with aggression, intolerance, bullying and disrespect for others. It is this price which we are paying as a nation for these technically but inappropriately crafted, conflict-based campaigns by political and media organisations.

Utilising academic learning requires commitment to the rules of the game; applying outcomes of theoretical research in a naïve manner leads to the consequences which we are noticing nowadays where people are readily available on workplaces, social media platforms, in the streets and even in our immediate families to tarnish every aspect of social fabric if anything goes against their preference or opinion.

On the basis of their strong attachments people assimilate the central character or the protagonist, which adjusts at the centre of their hopes. It is the second and probably the most important component of dramatic reality. People start attributing all their dreams, aspirations and expectations with the central character of the dramatic reality.

Now they start considering him/her the saviour, the champion, the transformer, and what not. Purposely built protagonists may not fulfil expectations of those who actually drive the whole dramatic reality, because such characters are
